

Department of Political Science & International Relations

The Department of Political Science & International Relations offers students a rigorous grounding in political theory, comparative politics, public policy, diplomacy, and the evolving dynamics of global affairs. Drawing inspiration from Bengal's rich legacy of social reform and international engagement, the department encourages critical inquiry into power, governance, and ethical leadership—locally, nationally, and across borders.

At the master's level, our curriculum balances classical foundations with contemporary issues such as climate diplomacy, digital governance, human-rights regimes, and South-South cooperation. Students benefit from small seminar-style classes, hands-on simulations (model parliaments and UN negotiations), fieldwork with government and civil-society partners, and access to an expanding archive of policy briefs and data sets. A dedicated research cell supports faculty-student collaborations, while visiting scholars and practitioners provide real-world perspectives. Graduates emerge equipped to pursue careers in academia, civil services, think tanks, development agencies, and international organizations, upholding the university's commitment to scholarship that serves society and shapes a more inclusive global future.
